Benefits and Impact

The information and tools delivered in this program are well-researched and highly-effective, but these are just some of the benefits to members negotiating the transition of returning to work after living with cancer. Equally important, members benefit from asking questions, voicing concerns and sharing common emotions in a secure, expertly facilitated environment. The outcome of this group encounter is often enlightenment, encouragement and empowerment to take the next step.

What to Expect at a Session

Members participate in eight, two-hour sessions. Topics covered include: the impact of cancer in work and life; decisions and considerations for returning to work; communication and negotiation with employers; and, physical and emotional challenges. In addition to listening and sharing, participants engage in brainstorming sessions, hear from others who have returned to work, and develop personal self care plans. If returning to work sounds like work, Wellspring Calgary's program lights the way with compassion and humour.

What the Research Says:

A high percentage of cancer patients return to work after treatment and workplace accommodation is pivotal in their successful return. The perceived willingness of the employer to accommodate a worker's illness and treatment needs is an important factor for return to work (Bouknight et al., 2006).

In a literature review and consultation in 2012 regarding returning to work concerns "60% of respondents indicated their income had decreased following their diagnosis." Canadian Partnership Against Cancer, Return to Work Concerns Faced by People Dealing with Cancer and Caregivers, Literature Review and Consultation, 2012.

According to a research report conducted by the Canadian Breast Cancer Network in 2009, "80% of respondents experienced a financial impact. On average, a $12,000 drop in annual household income was reported." Canadian Breast Cancer Network, Breast Cancer Economic Impact and Labour Force Re-Entry, 2009.
